Cybersecurity Awareness Month: Beware of The Dark Web

What is the Dark Web?

The 'Dark Web' uses complex systems that anonymize a user's true IP address, making it very difficult to work out which websites a device has visited. It is generally accessed using dedicated software, the best known is called Tor (The Onion Router).

The dark web refers to sites that are not indexed and only accessible via specialized web browsers. Significantly smaller than the surface web, the dark web is considered a part of the deep web. Using our ocean and iceberg visual, the dark web would be the bottom tip of the submerged iceberg.

The dark web, however, is a very concealed portion of the deep web that few will ever interact with or even see. In other words, the deep web covers everything under the surface that's still accessible with the right software, including the dark web.

What are the risks?

It is never a good idea to download unknown and unauthorized browsers on your machine. Stick to common browsers such as Chrome or Firefox and keep them updated. One of the most often transactional goods on the dark web marketplace is your data. There are tons of gigabytes of leaked credentials and personal information for sale for hackers. That's where hackers get their data for credential stuffing attacks, identity theft, and other shady business.

Here are some additional illegal activities you might encounter while navigating the Dark Web:

- Arms trafficking
- Drug trafficking
- Cryptocurrency scams
- NFT scams
- Phishing scams
- Espionage
- Sale of stolen credentials and data

Always remember, you should never try to connect to the dark web on a work or personal computer, you can easily be tracked by cyber criminals who may target you with malware or scams.

Engaging in this activity on the Brink's network is not permitted.
